Dined deliciously a quatre and were well entertained with Phil's inimitable talk at the Grahams.

Heavy rain this morning. Doubtful whether planes will fly to LaGuardia. I scurried around packing, mothballing clothes to be left behind, cellaring liquor. Lunched at the railroad station before taking the train to New York.

After I reached the Brook Club I found a message from Phyllis Bernau, Rusk's secretary, saying the President expected me for lunch at Newport on Sunday. He has asked Lord Home to meet him there.

E came up on an early plane, and is staying at the Jaretskis. We have had to revise our plans for the London trip. She will get off, as arranged, on Sunday morning; I shall follow on the 8 p.m. plane.

Spent most of the morning with George White on business. Without his skill and kindliness I don't know what I would have done for many years in respect to the management of our affairs.

Went to see Ailsa. She has an apartment temporarily at the Carlyle Hotel. It is [redacted] attractive, and was formerly occupied by Laura and Amory Houghton. Ailsa was in good spirits.

E and I lunched with Barry and Larry Lowman at the Colony Restaurant, as their guests. What a good couple and friends they are.

Had an informative talk with General Doriot, President of the American Research and Development Company of Boston, in which we have a considerable family investment. The stock has declined sharply from the price paid for it. Doriot is optimistic over the future success of the corporation's activities.

I shall cease to ruminate about him. His qualities are such as to entitle this citizen of the world at least to be named the foremost political philosopher of the Twentieth Century.

One thing might be added. The delicacy of his sentiments, his withdrawal from the obvious forms of conversation, convey a false impression of what is essentially a passionate nature.
